York High has many great and talented students and faculty. Many teachers are very friendly and are dedicated to teaching the students the subject as well as helping them in their daily lives. The negatives are associated with the limited amount of resources available and the undisciplined students that give York High a bad reputation.

Being in this inner city school, taught many life lessons that heavily funded or private schools will never teach. Though this school has flaws, the experience you learn and the eye opener that not every one is in the same situation you, will prepare you for the real world. The diversity and culture bred into us as students is something that I would not take over any other school even if they are the best. Changes this school need is definitely more funding. Though money can't buy happiness, more money will definitely help us as lower-income students into achieving our dream and enjoying our high school experience.

William Penn is a good school despite the rumors. The teachers are good and are knowledgeable in the subjects they teach. They have great theater and dance programs. It is also a very diverse school.

I started my first day at William Penn as a Junior and to be honest it was really rough. But it was more the students than the teachers and staff. The teachers always want to see you at your best. What I would change is how the metal detector system is and also try and have more options for student. For example, trying to learn Spanish is fine but it's the only language class available. I would also like to see them refine "Bearcat Hustle".

Although it may not have my dream school to graduate from, nonetheless, I graduated. Not only did I graduate, I graduated with honors. I overcame many obstacles that came to me during my senior year. I'd like to say, if you push yourself and focus on your end goal, you can achieve so much even through hard times!
